

I'm not a robot

China's military is rapidly deploying advanced AI-powered drones that are low-cost and agile on the battlefield, aiming to gain a technological edge in modern warfare. A new micro drone, resembling a thermal flask, has been showcased on state broadcaster CCTV, marking its first appearance. This mini drone is designed for use across infantry units of the People's Liberation Army and boasts a unique coaxial dual-rotor system, providing superior lift compared to traditional quadcopters. The drone can carry up to twice its own weight, thanks to its foldable rotors and modular payload bays, enabling it to support both reconnaissance and attack missions. Its silent operation allows for real-time battlefield intelligence transmission, while an on-board neural processing unit enables AI-powered targeting. A single operator can manage multiple drones simultaneously. This micro drone is part of a "phased leap" in unmanned combat team technology, as described by the military's official newspaper PLA Daily. The transition will be vital for defining future battlefield rules and gaining an early edge in intelligent warfare. The drone can also be launched from a 35mm grenade launcher, reducing take-off time and extending strike range. A similar drone, the CH-817, was showcased at the 2021 Zhuhai air show, optimized for guerrilla and urban warfare. Its compact system is designed to operate effectively in challenging environments.
