that these notes are not intended for use in the tribunals. This aids searching. The litigant in person will still be entitled to include which documents they consider necessary for inclusion in the e-bundle. If computer generated or typed the number becomes machine readable and can be searched for. If practicable entries should be hyperlinked to the indexed document. It is known that some solicitors are using commercial services which provide for that. It is not immutable, and should give way to any specific directions by particular courts or the requirements of particular judges in particular cases. If a core bundle is required under normal practice, then a PDF core bundle should be produced complying with the same requirements as a paper bundle. The bookmark should contain the page number of the document. Unless it is absolutely necessary the temptation to break sensibly bundled documents into smaller bundles just for the purpose of transmission should be avoided. If they cannot they should explain why. Pagination should not mask relevant detail on the original document. Bundling should follow the following principles: All bundles must, where the character of the document permits, be the subject of OCR (optical character recognition). The former may. The default view for all pages should be 100%. In larger cases it may be sensible to separate out those categories of documents into separate bundles.
