Photo Courtesy: Natasha Moustache/Getty Images Say what you like about 2020, but it's definitely been a year in which none of us will ever forget to put things as gently as possible. From the massive shortages of toilet paper to highly controversial presidential elections, the beginning of this decade has ushered in more than its fair share of historical events. Considering that many of us have been sheltered for months and months, distracted by a global health crisis and constantly bombarded by increasingly demanding news, it's easy to see why many of us look at 2020 as one big mess. That was precisely what it was: a difficult blur, often heartbreaking and sometimes optimistic. But with all the great things that have happened, it's important to keep a little perspective, even on the bigger events. These are the stories that define every month of what seems to be the longest year we've ever lived. On January 26, legendary basketball player Kobe Bryant, 13-year-old daughter Gianna and seven others were killed in a tragic helicopter accident while on their way to a basketball game at Bryant's Mamba Sports Academy. Fog and light rain covered the area around Calabasas, California – the site of the accident – that day, and while the final cause of the accident remains unknown, the weather may have caused the pilot to lose control of the aircraft. Photo Courtesy: Allen Berezovsky/Getty Images Millions of people around the world have mourned Bryant and his daughter, including the Los Angeles Lakers, the only professional team Bryant has played for in his ten-year career. Tributes also began to crop up in Japan and the Philippines, and the Lakers dedicated their October 2020 NBA championship victory to Bryant's memory. "It had no flaws", said basketball teammate LeBron James, and leaves the legacy of being one of the most talented and record-breaking stars in the NBA. This sinister and slow story of an unlucky family that slowly infiltrates the life of a wealthy family by addressing important issues such as social inequality and wealth disparities has garnered critical acclaim for everything from the issues to its execution. These elements, combined with the film's slow transition from total rebellion to unsettling horror, ensured Bong Joon-ho's Parasite in the cinema pantheon not to be missed. The film made history not only on screen, but also at the 92nd Academy Awards. Photo Courtesy: CJ Entertainment/IMDb Winner of the Oscar for Best Film (among a series of other awards), Parasite was the first non-English-language film to win the show's first prize, a decision that has led industry leaders to consider the film "the most important and revolutionary winner of the best film in the history of the Oscars. "Why so much fanfare? According to Los Angeles Times film critic Justin Chang, Parasite "shocked the Academy to recognize that no national cinema has a monopoly on greatness". After so long, the organization's "efforts to diversify its ranks and become a truly global institution" were finally producing an impetus. They were giving cinematic masterpieces, wherever they come from, the recognition they deserve. It's no coincidence that 2020 will forever be associated with the new coronavirus and COVID-19, the disease caused by the pathogen. Emerging for the first time in Wuhan, China, in January 2020, it was not until March 11 "enough time for hundreds of thousands of people around the world to contract the mysterious disease that the World Health Organization has officially called the coronavirus a pandemic. Photo Courtesy: Allen J. Schaben/Getty Images On March 13, Donald Trump declared A national emergency, pushing states to implement diffuse quarantine procedures and disease control and prevention centers (CDC) to start defining various measures to slow down the spread of By December 2020, the virus infected more than 76 million people worldwide, resulting in the death of more than 1.5 million. In early April, British Prince Harry and his wife Meghan – the Duke and Duchess of Sussex – officially did well on their January announcement that they would be resigning from their positions no longer serving as members of the British royal family or representing the queen. The first of the month marked their first day not using their real titles. The couple shocked millions of people all over the world when they announced they would step back from advertising that comes with real roles, opting instead to live a quieter, more private life, while raising children and building their own brand. Photo Courtesy: Karwai Tang/Getty Images Since April, they have stopped receiving public funds for their work and no longer use the title "Royal Highness" – but have maintained the designations Duke and Duchess of Sussex. The couple spent months from their official departure by navigating in the pandemic COVID-19, raising their son Archie and building a new life in Santa Barbara, California. On May 25, George Floyd, a 46-year-old black man, was arrested and murdered by Minneapolis police officers after a grocery store employee, told 911 Floyd that he had used a $20 counterfeit law to make a purchase. His terrible death, as police officers kneeled on his neck and body, was captured in video and unfairly lit indignations among Americans who reacted with horror. Millions channeled this energy by taking the streets in mass numbers to protest Floyd's death, asking for justice and asking for an end to police brutality that disproportionately targets black people. courtesy photo: John Lamparski/NurPhoto via Getty Images The protests, many of which were organized by the Black Lives Matter (BLM), continued for most of 2020 in cities across the country. Although these marches largely peaceful were sometimes encountered with government retaliation, the resulting movement became the largest in the history of the United States. Although the fight for racial equality continues, BLM and this year's protests have triggered some necessary changes in police reform, education, medical community and entertainment industry – when these changes were needed more than ever. 2019 was a bit of a turbine – not a full tornado like 2020 – when it came to news, but the policy was still in the forefront. It might be remembered that there were almost 30 presidential candidates of the Democratic Party who threw their hats into the ring and participated in primary debates that began in June 2019. While the months were wearing and the theater TV continued, many of us were wondering if a candidate would ever come out. courtesy photo: OLIVIER DOULIERY/AFP via Getty Images A frontrunner eventually extended, after 11 debates and months of speculation, Joseph R. Biden, long Senator Delaware and 47th Deputy President of the United States, announced on Twitter on June 5 that he had secured the more than 1,091 delegates needed to officially receive the party's appointment. Perhaps it was not a big surprise, considering that all other democratic presidential candidates had been withdrawn from the race by April. However, it became technically official, and the party finally had a clear picture of its roadmap for elections. The California wildfire season typically lasts every year from July to November, ending when the first great rainfall in autumn occurs and damping the flames. 2020, however, saw an extended that it had become "the worst in the history of the state until the amount of land burned" according to CNN – and that it was just in September. While some smaller fires unleashed in May and June, July saw a big uptick in events and a series of blazes that eventually burned hundreds of thousands of acres. The Red Red Salmon Complex which began on July 26, alone burned almost 150,000 acres. Photo Courtesy: Kent Nishimura/Los Angeles Times/Getty Images These fires set the stage for the rest of the tragic season: Five of California's six largest fires took place in August and September 2020, creating hellish landscapes, triggering emergency evacuations and covering much of the state in dense and harmful smoke. Many of the over 9,600 fires of the year burned well in December, and the reason is clear. "Climate change plays an undeniable role in unprecedented fires in recent years," says Scientific American. "More than half of the burned acres in the Western United States can be attributed to climate change." For months, the world wondered who potential presidential candidate Joe Biden would choose as his running partner. Once he was clearly becoming the presumed candidate, he "voted to choose a woman as his potential vice president," and many began to speculate as a name from a variety of senators and state leaders who eventually would choose. Photo Courtesy: Stefani Reynolds/Bloomberg via Getty Images On August 11 – a few days before their appointment to the 2020 Democratic National Convention – Biden officially announced that his former Democratic primary rival and Senator Junior of California, Kamala Harris, would become the vice presidential candidate. While this announcement was long awaited, it was also one for history books. Harris became the first woman and the first black person to receive the vice presidential nomination of a major political party in the United States, leading to the White House a certain diversity. In the wake of Kamala Harris who made the titles with its historical appointment, the United States lost one of the greatest champions of gender equality we have ever had the privilege of knowing. On September 18, 2020, Ruth Bader Ginsburg died of cancer complications at the age of 87. Ginsburg spent 27 years at the service of the Supreme Court and dedicated a whole life at the end of discrimination and the breakup of barriers. Complimentary photo: Eugene Golopursky/Getty Images Since his early days of work as a legal researcher and law professor for his last years as a judge and possible Associate Justice, Ginsburg has argued for our equality in any case – and has never stopped pushing for our right to live authentically too. It is for her that many of us are allowed to own our destinies, and her contributions to the judicial system have rightly secured her place in history as a prominent feminist icon. On the evening of October 1, Donald Trump announced that he and his wife Melania had tested positively for COVID-19, which means he was potentially infected when he participated in the first presidential debate with Biden on September 29. Trump was later admitted to the Walter Reed National Military Medical Center, where he made a series of video appearances and later led by supporters outside the facility while still undergoing treatment. Photo Courtesy: Ken Cedeno/Polaris/Bloomberg via Getty Images The second three debate was scheduled on 15 October. Trump returned to the White House on October 5 and began hosting public events on the days after his resignation from Walter Reed. The organizers planned the second debate to take place virtually, with candidates participating via livestream from remote locations, but Trump refused to respect these limitations, instead choosing to participate in his municipality on NBC. The third programmed debate took place as planned on 22 October, making 2020 the first election year since 1996 where only two debates took place. After one of the most divisive presidential elections in United States history, November has finally revealed a victory for President-elect Joe Biden and Vice President-Elect Kamala Harris. At the beginning of the month, after days of counting at the state level following an election an election Biden and Harris appeared at a television event of acceptance in Wilmington, Delaware. Photo Courtesy: Win McNamee / Getty Images During his speech, Biden invoked the units among Americans, bringing a message of hope for the next four years. À C tel worked for those who did not vote for me how much for those who did it". Biden reassured voters. À «That sad was of demonization in America to end up here and now ... there has never been anything that we have not been able to do when we did together." After a year of First historians and significant minimums, a light has finally appeared at the end of the tunnel in the last moments of 2020: after months of development, test and fast-tracking, the Covid-19 vaccine of the Pfizer pharmaceutical giant has received the authorization for Emergency use from US food and drug administration. Although the vaccine still has to be subjected to different long-term test cycles, the first doses were administered to health professionals on December 14th. Photo Courtesy: Joe Raedle / Getty Images while the Budget of the Covid-19 in the United States has exceeded 300,000 deaths, the vaccine arrived at a time when many of us needed, not only to avoid contracting the disease , but also to support us and relaunch morale at the end of what has been a dark and difficult year. As the vaccine is increasingly available, it is hoped that a return to a new form of normality is at the horizon for 2021.
