Best video screen recorder app. Screen video recorder app download for android. How to record video on screen android. Best video screen recorder app for android.

One of our more frequent requests from readers is to tell them how to record your screen on Android. The functionality has been around for quite some time but usually requires some tinkering and adjustment to get it. In Android Lollipop, they have a screen recording method building into the OS and that's how most people do it these days. Let's take a look at a few Android apps and some other methods to get you screen recording. Please note, changes to Android Pie prohibit apps from recording internal sound so your videos most likely won't have the sounds of anything you do. It's unfortunate, but it's Google's fault. The best Android apps for screen recording AZ Screen Recorder is the gold standard for screen recorder apps. It's light, easy, accessible, and cheap. It features an overlay button that doesn't interfere with the recorded content. In addition, you can add the front-facing camera for things like game streams or commentary. It even has a small video editor built-in. That way you can shave away the parts that don't matter. Of course, it doesn't require root, has no watermarks, no time limits, and more. The pro version goes for $2.99. It's probably the best and most popular screen recorder available. Price: Free / $3.99 per month / $16.99 per year InShot is a pretty popular developer on Google Play when it comes to video tools. Its screen recorder app is among the most popular. It works for basically any task from recording tutorial videos to recording video games. The app also features internal audio recording, a lightweight video editor to clean stuff up, and it doesn't have a watermark. It works pretty well for what it does. Native Android has a screen recorder now, but this one adds a little extra that the internal screen recorder doesn't have. There is a subscription service for some of the features, but otherwise, it's good. Many streaming services now include mobile support. Twitch and YouTube Gaming are two of the most prominent ones. You simply stream your gameplay like normal. Both services allow you to download your footage after you're done. It's a good solution for gamers especially. In fact, it's probably better than Google Play Games for this kind of stuff. Unlike Google Play Games, it's kind of difficult to use this one for apps or anything other than gaming. At least these services are free. Price: Free with ads / $2/month / $10/year / $40/lifetime Vysor is a fun little app that allows you to cast your device to your computer screen over USB. From there, you can use it on your computer or screen record it on your PC if you'd like to. It tends to work pretty well although you will need to fork out a little bit of money in order to get HD quality. This app doesn't record anything on its own so don't expect any options to do so. You'll have to record it on your computer on your own. If this app isn't cutting it for you, TeamViewer is another decent option in this space. You do need a screen recording app on your computer in order to capture footage, though. Joe Hindy / Android Authority Android natively supports screen recording and has for a few years. You can usually find it among the quick settings toggles. Simply hit the toggle and the phone begins screen recording. This is a good option for simple things. There is no additional software to get in the way and you can send the video wherever you need it once it's done. There are other ways to record your screen on Android and that is by using hardware. There are two main ways to do so using hardware: Professionals often use a capture card to hook their Android device right into their computer and record it from there. Capture cards can get rather expensive but you'll get probably the best frame rates and quality. Plus it records directly to your computer hard drive which allows for much larger recordings. Earlier models had to work around some potential HDCP problems, but modern capture cards don't have that problem. There are other apps like Vysor on the Google Chrome app store. The basic idea is to connect your phone to your computer. It then mirrors the screen directly to your computer. From there, you just have to figure out how to record it yourself. It's not the easiest method by any stretch. Each app also has a different setup. However, it is an option. Some Chromebooks now include the ability to mirror your Android device directly to it. This, of course, requires buying a Chromebook. That's an unreasonable expenditure for what should be a relatively simple task. However, we do try to cover all of the bases here and this is definitely an option. You still need an app to record your Chromecast screen, though. Thank you for reading! Try these out too: If we missed any great methods of screen recording on Android, tell us about them in the comments! You can also click here to check out our latest Android app and game lists! There's a lot going on on your Android screen. Maybe you've just scored a kill in PUBG mobile and want to share it with the world or perhaps want to record snippets of your screen for a video you're making. In other words, there are plenty of reasons to want an Android screen recording app, and you can start here with some of the best Android screen recording apps. 1. Twitch Price: Free Many people who want to record their screen do so because of gaming. If you're looking to stream yourself playing a mobile game on your phone, or even if you just want to download the footage for editing or private use, you can do so through the app of the most popular streaming platform out there: Twitch. Of course, Twitch's built-in recording-streaming features are substantial. The app lets you record and broadcast most Android games, capture audio using an internal or external mic, and open up your stream to the public. Crucially, you can download whatever you record straight to your phone. 2. ADV Screen Recorder Price: Free (in-app purchases) One of the top-rated Android screen recording apps around, ADV Screen Recorder, may not be entirely sincere in its trailer when it says it's "100% FREE" (as it offers in-app purchases), but you can still enjoy most of its features free of charge. There are two different engines for recording in ADV, with the more advanced one offering features like pausing your recordings as well as continuing them. Other unique features include the ability to doodle on the screen while you're recording, giving your videos a nice free-flowing immediacy. You can make all kinds of edits to your videos, too, like adding text and banners, as well as trimming them down to size. 3. XRecorder Price: Free (in-app purchases) The most popular apps on the Play Store aren't always the best, but XRecorder is one of those that justifies its position at the top of the charts. Yes, XRecorder is ad-supported, but it doesn't have watermarks, doesn't limit your recording time, and doesn't require a rooted phone. XRecorder records video at up to 1080p 60FPS, which is as much as you'll need from most phones. You can add a little facecam of yourself in the corner of your gameplay recording sessions, and it has a handy onboard video editor that lets you tweak your videos almost on the fly. It comes with an overlay that lets you quickly take the snaps and footage you need, and unlike some recording apps, it doesn't require Internet access. 4. Integrated Screen Recorders This will vary much depend on which phone you have, but there are several custom and manufacturer-made ROMs out there that come pre-packed with their own screen recorders. The latest Samsung phones, for example, have a screen recorder available in the Quick Settings menu, as do Xiaomi phones. Google Pixel phones running Android 11 onward also let you screen-record from Quick Settings. If you're into your custom ROMs, then ROMs like Resurrection Remix and Havoc OS have built-in screen recorders. 5. Android 10 Secret Screen Recorder Price: Free In the Android 10 beta, users were excited to find that there was a new screen-recording function baked right in to the OS. However, for some reason, Google decided to omit it from the final version of Android 10. But - double plot twist - you can still unlock this built-in screen-recording feature with a bit of twiddling! It's particularly elegant, as its icon resides right there in your Quick Settings menu. It's not perfect yet, and some people have reported some bugs, but it's still cool that it's right there for you to use. You need to enable developer mode as well as do some things in ADB for this to work, so we've created a guide on enabling the hidden Android 10 screen recorder. 6. Screen Recorder Price: Free With a name that's both succinct and honest, Screen Recorder makes our list. It makes it extremely easy to record videos. A blue button will start recording the screen, and a small handy widget will appear over whichever screen you're viewing on your phone. It can record HD resolutions up to 120fps (if your display can handle it) and lets you add all kinds of flair to your recordings, such as logos, images and text. Of course, there's an option to switch on the mic so you can speak over your recordings, and there's a Facecam option too, if you're trying to make a recording with that professional "Let's Play" kind of look. You can use this in day or night mode, and it includes some pretty nifty editing features like video trimming (of course) and the option to take notes as you record. 7. MNML Screen Recorder Price: Free Still in early access but refreshingly free of all the ads, paywalls and other annoyances that blight certain apps on the Play Store, MNML Screen Recorder is an open-source screen recorder that focuses on ease of use above all else. (The name is pronounced "minimal," apparently.) Even though it's not yet on version 1.0, it feels great to use, recording at up to 60fps with bit rates up to 24 Mbps. At this point, resolutions are capped to 1080p, but the devs are working hard to raise this limit, stating that Android has made it awkward to increase the recording frame rate. You can download the app from the Play Store or Github and show your support for a free screen recorder that cuts out much of the BS. 8. Google Play Games Price: Free If you want to avoid downloading any third-party apps, and particularly if you mainly want to record gaming stuff, then you can just use the official Play Games app on your Android device. Just open the Play Games app, go to a game's info page, then tap the "Record" (video camera) icon at the top of the screen. You'll get options to record in 480p and 720p, so nothing too high-def, but it's integrated, so we're not complaining. To use this feature to record non-gaming stuff, follow the above steps, then just exit the game when it launches. Simple. 9. Mobizen Screen Recorder Price: Free Mobizen is deservedly one of the most popular screen-recording apps on the Play Store, offering a wealth of features, including full HD recording at 60fps. It has a number of tools for adding pizzazz to your videos after you've recorded them, too, such as background music and the option to record yourself doing intro and outro videos. It's particularly good for gaming, letting you record your sessions at the same time as recording your face reacting to the on-screen action. (Who knows? You may just be the next PewDiePie ... God help us all.) 10. AZ Screen Recorder Price: Free / $2.99 AZ Screen recorder does not require root access (great start) and has an option to pause and resume recording, which is particularly useful for making tutorial videos. It also has a front-facing camera overlay feature, but it requires a paid upgrade to unlock this. You can change settings like resolution, frame rate, bit rate and even feature a text message or logo along with the recorded screen cast. Microphone recording is supported. Now that you know how to screen-record on Android, how about recording your screen in Windows 10? Android is also great for off-the-radar apps that you can use to download music, so we've made a list of the best free music download apps for Android. Is this article useful?
