read() - read from a file descriptor##ENDARTICLEThe terms provided appear to pertain to various functionalities within the realm of computing. Many of these terms directly relate to input/output operations, data processing, and system management. Some examples include functions for dealing with files, such as fopen(3) or fread(3), which are used for reading from external storage devices and processing retrieved information. Moreover, several commands and interfaces are mentioned that allow users to perceive and interpret various forms of data, including audio signals (aio_error(3)) or image data (xdr(3)). Some terms refer to specialized systems, such as aio_uring_prep_read(3), which seem designed for managing complex input/output operations. Other terms hint at the utilization of external tools, like fuse(4) for file system management, or lirc(4) and random(4) in relation to various types of inputs and sensors. Furthermore, mentioning of signal-safety(7) highlights concerns for safety protocols during data processing activities. Lastly, the presence of terms such as proc_pid_fdinfo(5), proc_pid_io(5), and systemd.exec(5) points toward detailed interfaces within system administration, particularly in dealing with processes, resource management, and command execution.
