Paul Krugman, Nobel laureate in Economic Sciences for 2008, received his undergraduate degree from Yale University and PhD from Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT). Before joining Princeton University, he taught at various institutions including Yale, Stanford, MIT, and even served on the staff of Council of Economic Advisers in 1982-1983. His research has made significant contributions to international trade, economic geography, and currency crises. In addition to his academic work, Krugman writes for general audiences as a regular columnist for The New York Times and author of best-selling books that have become modern classics. Krugman's co-author Robin Wells is an economics lecturer and researcher at Princeton University, having taught undergraduate courses. She holds degrees from the University of Chicago and University of California, Berkeley, with postdoctoral work at MIT. Her teaching experience spans several institutions including the University of Michigan, University of Southampton (UK), Stanford, and MIT. The book written by Krugman and Wells offers an engaging storytelling style that explains economic concepts in today's world. The latest edition includes new insights into market power and externalities in microeconomics, updated analysis on long-run growth, and extensive coverage of the coronavirus pandemic's economic impacts and policy responses in macroeconomics.
